For Immediate Release

Thame Food Festival Oxfordshire's Real Food Event 8 weeks to go

There is a sense of real excitement building for this year's Thame Food Festival to be held in the centre of the market town on Saturday 25th September 2010.

"There is so much great local food and so many wonderfully dynamic local food producers and retailers in our area. We want to put local food on the map" says Sally Dickinson, one of the joint organisers of the event.

Market Town Co-ordinator, Alison Isherwood, adds. "In simple terms we want the Festival to help people discover local food, support the cause and boost local food businesses. There's so much to gain for everybody."

The aim is to build a real food event that Oxfordshire and the surrounding counties can be proud of. All food producers are encouraged to take a stand as it is a great chance to showcase and sell their wares.

In addition to street entertainment, food and drink sampling, real ales, children's cookery workshops and the opportunity to buy mouth-watering local produce, there will be cooking shows and demonstrations with confirmed appearances from local celebrity chef Lottie Duncan and Italian cookery specialist and author Kate Caldesi.

Whether you're local and interested in food, or a local food business you won't want to miss out. 21st Century Thame who promote awareness of the town have also played a role in supporting the event.

The Festival is a free day for all the family but there will also be some ticketed events, including some of the food demos: details available soon from the website.

A limited number of stalls are still available for £30 a stand: please see the website www.thamefoodfestival.org.uk and the Festival organisers would love to hear from any potential sponsors. Sponsorship packages start at only £250.

We can hardly wait.
